Preparing future principals

Systems are key: enabling conditions must be in place to support cohesive principal preparation across the nation

- Workforce planning – progression pathways, succession planning, demystification of the role
- System alignment – connections clearly made to Australian Professional Standard for Principals, system priorities, impact on student outcomes

The principal job is not for everyone: the right people need to be identified early and deliberately developed

- Talent spotting — early identification of the aptitudes needed for success
- Career pathways and structures — clear promotional opportunities and connections, career ladders
- Learning and support — timely professional learning opportunities, ongoing support at role take-up

Content matters: principals need the skills and knowledge to meet the changing demands of the role

- Deeper subject matter knowledge and expertise — pedagogical knowledge to promote a learning culture, instructional leadership and capacity building skills
- Higher order skills — strategic thinking, change leadership, values articulation, leadership identity
- Interpersonal skills — communicating effectively, building trust and collaboration
- Management skills — business acumen, delegation and distributed leadership abilities

Some preparation strategies are better than others: focus on the ones that work

- Selection — rigorous recruitment of suitable applicants for professional learning opportunities
- Timeliness — learning that is suited to each stage in the leadership journey
- Varied learning experiences — personalised and blended learning (e.g. case studies, e-learning, mentoring, reflective journals, internships, action research)

The role of the principal is crucial: we need to know what makes a difference

- Systems — strategic decision-making about investment in and timing of leadership development options
- Providers — programs informed by what works and examples of best practice
- Individuals — ability to determine their best leadership paths
